

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

A method for making a joint between an initially closed tubular member and a hollow component includes the steps of using a fluid under high pressure acting on walls of the tubular member and component in a joint area to form at least one common indentation on the walls of the tubular member and of the component and using the high-pressure fluid to widen the tubular member in the joint area to form a non-circular cross-section.